Chaffey & Smith

The 5 P

Loutenborn's 4C Model

- Customer needs and wants (which the product satisfies)
- Cost to the customer (price)
- Convenience (availability/place)
- Communication (promotion).

Beyond the Mix

- Although the mix provides a useful framework for marketers, strategy (e.g. determining your positioning and selecting which segments to target) also needs to be considered.
- Decisions on the mix are not made until the marketing strategy has first clearly defined the target markets and brand positioning.

ONLINE VALUE PROPOSITION

- The online proposition can offer some of the online advantages such as immediacy, interactivity and additional information, maybe even virtual experiences or virtual testing. Note: the offline value proposition can also offer the online added
- value by encouraging customers to visit the web site to enjoy the same benefits
- The OVP is more than the sum of features, benefits and prices; it should encompass the complete experience of selecting, buying and using the product or service.
- The traditional categories of the different elements of the marketing mix are beginning to blur as proposition merges with product experience. About time too, as all of the mix must be seamlessly integrated.
